Office visit notes dated 2/8/08 by the resident's California physician indicated the resident had a recurring pressure ulcer on her right heel. The physician indicated that on the day of the office visit, the resident had a Stage II pressure ulcer on the right heel and that the resident was incapable of performing her own personal care. Employee #7, a caregiver, reported on 2/2/09 that Resident #4 did not have a primary physician in Nevada when she was admitted to the facility and the daughter was trying to set up an initial appointment with one for her mother. The resident was seen by her new Nevada physician on 5/13/08. There were no notations in the office visit forms indicating the physician had been informed the resident had a pressure ulcer on her right heel. An Initial Nursing Assessment from a wound clinic dated 5/16/08 was found in Resident #4's file. It was later determined the daughter, who was a registered nurse, made the referral to the wound clinic for her mother. The clinic assessment indicated Resident #4 had a non-healing un-stageable wound on her right heel that was two months old. Wound clinic documents revealed the pressure ulcer was cultured and debrided on 5/16/08. The wound was found to be infected and antibiotics were prescribed for the resident. Review of the facility documents found no evidence the resident's

Wound clinic documents revealed the pressure ulcer was cultured and debrided on 5/16/08. The wound was found to be infected and antibiotics were prescribed for the resident. Wound care instructions dated 5/16/08 from the clinic were found in the facility. Prescribed products used for wound treatment were also found in the facility. There was no evidence in the facility or wound clinic records that home health nursing care was ordered for treatment of the wounds at the facility. Six months after Resident #4's initial visit to the wound clinic, clinic records dated 11/3/08 showed the resident's wounds had become worse. The resident's previous right heel wound was now a Stage III pressure ulcer and a second Stage III pressure ulcer had developed on the right heel. The resident had developed an unstageable pressure ulcer on the left heel and a Stage II pressure ulcer on her left fifth toe. The four wounds were cultured during the visit and were found to be infected so antibiotics were ordered. Wound clinic notes showed the clinic debrided the resident's foot wounds on 11/24/08. There was no evidence in the facility or wound clinic records that home health nursing care was ordered to provide continued treatment of the wounds from 11/24/08 to the date of the survey. Employee #11, a caregiver, reported on 2/5/09 that Resident #4's daughter instructed him on how to perform the wound care and dressing changes on the resident's right heel. The Review of Employee #11's record found he was not a medical professional and had no formal training in wound care management. The facility administrator was interviewed on 2/5/09 and asked why she admitted a resident who had a problem with recurring pressure ulcers. The administrator indicated that she did not have knowledge of Resident #4's previous wounds. The administrator reported she thought the pressure ulcer developed on the resident's heel, "during the long drive from the California." The distance of the drive was approximately 200 miles. The administrator admitted she did not obtain medical treatment and wound management for the resident once she became aware of the pressure ulcer on the resident's right heel. The administrator stated the daughter of the resident was a RN and told them she was going to do the nursing care on the wound. Resident #4's daughter was interviewed on 2/6/09. The daughter stated that she worked full time and was too busy to go to the facility on "every shower-day" to treat and dress her mother's wound. The resident's shower days were scheduled two to three times a week depending on how soiled her dressings were. The daughter stated she taught the staff at the facility how to do treat and dress the resident's heel wound. The daughter reported no one in the facility told her that the facility staff were not qualified or allowed to perform skilled care such as wound management.

Findings include:

Resident #6 reported staff prepared the insulin syringe for her, but she injected it herself. The physician's order for the resident indicated Levemir was to be given twice daily at 55 AM/45 PM.

Employee #11 reported that caregivers drew up insulin into syringes for the two diabetic residents (#1 and #6). The employee further stated the residents used to have pre-filled pens, but they could not afford them any longer.

None of the caregivers were medical or nursing professionals authorized to draw medications into syringes.
